

THEME

In a world of limited resources, we are faced with the contested norms of politics, industry, religion and humanistic values. The challenged space is chaotic due to the tussle between the historical and discursive boundaries of nations, identities, and technology. In an acute violence of signs of civilization and environment, the latter becomes a subaltern space that is articulated in the garbed subversion of the green challenge, and the foregrounding of the evil eyes of dominant hegemonic ideologies which include the corporate world and its free market economy with all its attending hazards. In the confusion, the altruistic and moral spirits submerge in the current state of Globalisation. Globalisation means a reality where the world becomes more closely and internally linked by the trans-border trade, economic policies, and interconnected informational technologies. Globalisation is no longer a term awaited, it has been a reality, inevitable, and is a necessity. It is required to ensure a universal international understanding through moral tendering of the basic human tendencies. Globalism as a discourse needs to address the question of human freedom, breaking the shackles of bondage, trans-border migration in search of new locations of culture, preserving the micro units of the world, and also a movement to protect the environment before it becomes 'the wretched of the earth'. The main challenge of globalism is to protect the micro units of life from being depersonalized, deposed, and destroyed. There is a need to ensure a bonding between globalism, environmentalism, and morality so that globalisation does not become a mode of negation that may seek to undermine the completeness of human existence or manipulating its representation, and eventually failing to become a resistance to the exploitation of the humans, animals and the environment which is corrosive and counterproductive to globalism.
